If hurricane Katrina taught us one thing about major disasters, it was that national level responders are not locally responsive, local first responders are quickly overwhelmed, and, ultimately, neighbors must depend on neighbors for immediate mutual assistance and protection.

The community-based disaster preparedness program for Palos Verdes Estates was established by resident volunteers working with the PVE Police Department and expert professionals to increase the community's survivability in a major disaster.

Major funding for program planning, development and acquisition of disaster management equipment and supplies has been established from PVE City funds and generous community donations. However, funding for sustaining the program is required. The program volunteers and the City will continue to seek public, non-profit, and private funding sources.
